PILLS. WINTER IS HERE.

THE TIMES-RICHMOND VA. WEDNESDAY DECEMBER 21 1892

The Genuine Article Began to be Served at 3 O'clock This Morning.

Astronomically speaking, winter began at 3 o'clock this morning. The sun, which has for months been steadily journeying southward, now halts in his course, and, after a few days of apparent indecision, turns his distant but glowing face once more toward the chilly north. When the sun first turns about he does not make much headway, and there is no percepti-ble lengthening of the days until January is well under way. When the new year comes in the increase of daylight will amount to about three minutes, and Old Sol's pace will then materially quicken, for he trave's on schedule time and has to make the on schedule time and has to make the quarter by March.

In reference to bodies celestial the Baltimore American had the following learned article yesterday:

December is one of the most interesting months of the year to the student of astronomical phenomena. When the moon occulted Saturn, on the 12th, a series of interesting heavenly events was ushered in, and astronomers will find ever-varying features presented in their colottal sudies until after the death of the old year. Of course, there is nothing new to them Of course, there is nothing new to them in these events, which are we'l known to even tyros with the telescope, but even the routine at this season presents a phase of interest even to those who have phase of interest even to those who have watched similar changes and movements of the stars for years. Many of the principal planets during the past two weeks have played their parts in the astronomical drama, and for the time being retired from the stage. Jupiter will occur on the 26th. On Christmas day there will be a conjunction with Mars. The monthly, as well as the annual, record will close early on the morning of the 3ist by a Nentune and the moon. Jupiter's claim to the rank of being the most important of the evening host is far beyond dispute; for, although he is getting beyond dispute; for, although he is getting further and further from us, his brilliancy causes him far to outshine all surroundings, and renders it very easy to distinguish him, and makes it a very simple matter to see why the Romana designated Jupiter as the god of the skies. His importance just now is increased by the confirmation of the report of the discovery of a fifth satellite, which has joined the others in their revolutions about that body. These little objects resemble stars, but they can be distinguished from stars by their cerseless movements around the planet, which they never fall to accompany during his entire circuit of the heavens.

second meeting for the month between Neavens.

Venus has drawn somewhat nearer the sun, and is perceptibly decreasing in size, her disk measuring only about one-fifth what it did in midsummer. She is still beautiful, however, in the early morning hours. Saturn is, on the other, hand, gradually growing, and is already attracting attention in the morning skies. Mercury, too, has become a morning star, and, like the star of empire, is westward taking his flight. Soon after the new year begins he will reach the end of his journey, and will start back toward the centre of the universe. Neptune, as before stated, has the honor of closing the annual celegial performance by being annual celegial performance by being again in conjunction with the moon during the closing hours of the old year, and will then go off with his boon companion Uranus for a midwinter jaunt brough the heavens. And so the heavenly tableau constantly hanges, and still other scenes will greet s during the coming winter weeks. A unch of light to be seen above the astern horizon soon after dark assures eastern horizon soon after dark assures us that the Pleiades are about to develop themselves, and that navigation can be once more attempted with safety, at least that was what the ancient Greeks said whenever this group came in sight. Masnificent Orion follows soon after, and lends dignity and beauty to the skies throughout the night. Still higher is Alderbaran, in the constellation of Taurus. There are also the two Dog Stars, the Twins, Capelia, Altai, Vega, the Northern Cross and others of the first magnitude, which we shall probably know far better as the month advances and the clear, crisp winter atmosphere affords us a chance to study them in their full glory.
